A compelling and wide-ranging study on why an informed and locally relevant social response to HIV is the only way forward

“Theoretically sophisticated, empirically grounded, and analytically rigorous – this is the most important work to be published on the HIV epidemic in decades.” –Richard Parker, Columbia University

“Combining insightful analysis with trenchant critique, this book offers a readable and refreshing new perspective on what must be done.” –Peter Aggleton, University of New South Wales

“Kippax and Stevenson elegantly argue a difficult but critical message that needs to be heard.” –Alan Whiteside OBE, Balsillie School of International Affairs, Wilfrid Laurier University and University of KwaZulu-Natal

This book addresses the major challenge for HIV prevention: that is, to reach beyond the limitations of biomedical approaches to disease and to design prevention strategies informed by and connected with the social realities of people’s lives.

Readership

The book will be of interest to biomedical researchers, epidemiologists, health promoters, social scientists working in HIV, community organisations, and postgraduate students studying public health.
