First monograph of the travel writings of Marguerite Blessington (1788–1849).

'Superbly researched and beautifully written, Aneta Lipska's book brings back into welcome focus one of the most intriguing women authors of the early nineteenth century. This is a significant contribution to travel writing studies.' —Peter Hulme, Emeritus Professor in Literature, University of Essex, UK

'In this pioneering study, Aneta Lipska saves Marguerite Blessington's travel accounts from near oblivion and convincingly proves that Blessington was more than Lord Byron's scandalous interlocutor. She was a gifted writer who mastered the convention of a travelogue in the epoch of pre-commercial journeying.' —Zbigniew Białas, Professor of English, University of Silesia, Poland

'This is a very useful addition to recent studies of Lady Blessington, offering a sophisticated, theoretically informed approach to women's travel writing in the nineteenth century. It illuminates distinctive features of her style, such as the intermingling of "fact" and "fiction", and deepens understanding of the cultural context of British travel in Europe in the period.' — Michael Hollington, Honorary Research Fellow, University of Kent, UK

This book is the first monograph of the travel writings of Marguerite Blessington (1788–1849) and offers the first detailed analysis of her four travel books.
