This book offers a psychological account of thrills, of the epiphanic experience of seeing ordinary things in a profoundly new way, and of the experience of the sublime.

A psychological explanation of goosebumps and tears, of the epiphanic experience of seeing something ordinary in a profoundly new way, and of the overwhelming perception of the sublime. These experiences found in life and literature involve a feeling of coming to know something deeply important but impossible to describe.

Readership

Students and scholars of literature, stylistics, cognitive poetics, and the psychology of aesthetics.

Key selling points

- First to treat them together: the experience of the sublime, of 'epiphany' which is generally a profound experience of something ordinary, and the feeling of 'thrills' which can be a shiver down the spine or sudden tears.
- Reviews some of the work on the sublime and epiphanies, including life-changing epiphanies, in the literary critical, philosophical and psychological literature.

Contents

Introduction: Strong Experiences, and What Causes Them; The Study of Strong Experiences; Epistemic Feelings, and Knowledge; Arousal, Emotion, and Strong Experiences; The Psychological Background; How Literature Triggers Strong Experiences; Conclusions; Bibliography; Index.
