This book unravels the emotional tapestry of refugee support in Slovakia and suggests a framework for studying interaction in migration contexts that fuses approaches to emotion and morality.

This ethnography accompanies people who support refugees in Slovakia—outlining the personal and political dilemmas that complicate refugee care in Central Eastern Europe and beyond.

Readership

Students and researchers of the Visegrád and other Central European societies across disciplines, anthropologists, and other social scientists of migration and refugees

Key selling points

Presents the only monograph in English on refugee care in an Eastern European country

Is a beautifully written, engaging and evocative ethnography, focusing on the stories and struggles of individual people

Contributes to the current debate on rising illiberalism, right-wing populism, and racism in formerly socialist EU member states

Makes a theoretical contribution to refugee and migration studies by suggesting a framework for studying interaction in migration contexts that fuses approaches to emotion and morality.
