Provides contemporary and interdisciplinary reflections on the changing patterns of civic participation in Australian democracy.

This edited collection provides contemporary and interdisciplinary reflections on the changing patterns of civic participation in Australian democracy.

Readership

The book is primarily aimed at an academic audience in fields such as political science, law, history, sociology, journalism and philosophy. Given the topicality of the issues discussed in the book, it is reasonable to expect it to be a valuable resource for undergraduate teaching (particularly in political science, journalism and law), further expanding the potential market for the book. Australian politics is also of significant interest to the public, more generally, such that it is reasonable to expect that there would be at least some interest in the book from a more general, non-academic readership.

Key selling points

Discussion of recent Voice to Parliament referendum in Australia

Climate change

Voting in Australia

Civic engagement with groups such as the Australian African diaspora

About the Author(s) / Editor(s)

Sarah Murray is a Professor at the University of Western Australia Law School and is an expert in constitutional law and electoral law, court innovation and community justice centers.

Lachlan Umbers is Senior Lecturer and Chair of Philosophical Studies at the University of Western Australia. He works primarily in moral and political philosophy, with a particular focus upon issues in democratic theory and climate justice.
